Fed set to deliver quarter-point rate hike along with “one last hawkish sting in the tail”

Article by Gregg Robb of MarketWatch, 1/28/2023

When will Fed pause? It’s now seen as a coin-toss between March and May.

The Federal Reserve will downshift to a 25 basis point rise in its policy interest rate at their upcoming interest-rate meeting and will work overtime to make sure that the market doesn’t get the idea that rate increases are finished, economists said.

“Despite the good news on inflation and being one step closer to done, it’s likely too soon for the Fed to stop raising rates and likely too soon to signal a stop is imminent,” said Jonathan Pingle, economist at UBS.

The sting will come from Jerome Powell who will be “thinking very carefully about how not to send an inadvertently dovish signal,” agreed Jonathan Miller, senior U.S. economist at Barclays Capital.

Powell will hold a press conference at 2:30 p.m. Eastern on Wednesday, a half-hour after the Federal Open Market Committee announced its rate decision.

But it won’t be easy. Markets already seem to be celebrating the demise of inflation and the return of low interest rates.

The widely expected quarter-point rate hike will push up the Fed’s benchmark rate to a range of 4.5%-4.75%. Rates were close to zero last March.
