How Long Might The Bear Market Last?????

Simon Moore, Senior Contributor at Forbes.com writes that simply looking at history suggests that we are already some way into the bear market. An analysis by First Trust of bear markets since 1942 finds that the average decline in a bear market is -32%, which would correspond to the S&P500 falling to around 3,300 or about another -12% from current levels, and the bear market lasting about a year. That would suggest the bear market would end around December 2022. Of course, keeping in mind that we're already some way into a bear market.

Also, if you look at a different index, such as the tech-heavy Nasdaq, then the bear market started earlier and has fallen further, so the bear market may be closer to being over.

On the other hand, there were some nasty bear markets before the second World War, so including those in the analysis adds about another 6 months to the average bear market and increases the average decline.

Either way if history is any guide, we could be around half-way into a bear market in terms of timing, and over half-way in terms of stock declines. There's also about a 1 in 4 chance, that we've seen the worst of a bear market already, based on history as several bear markets never saw much worse than a 20% decline in stocks.

So while history can't provide complete comfort and does show examples of nasty bear markets with declines approaching 50% and bear markets lasting almost 2 years in most cases history is starting to suggest that things could get better from here. Most of the damage may have already been done.
